Mountain Viper initiated for OEF embedded training teams

PFC. ANDREW S. KEIRN Marines of Embedded Training Team 4-2 provide security for the rest of their fellow Marines climbing out of the Humvee Egress Assistance Trainer during their mounted operations training here, April 21-28.

COMBAT CORRESPONDENT

Marines have conducted pre-deployment training since the beginning of Operation Enduring Freedom, but for the first time a new training program has been initiated that focuses on closing the gap between American assistance and Afghan self-reliance.

The Security Cooperation Training and Education Command is working in conjunction with the Mountain Warfare Training Center and Third Marine Division to conduct advisor-specific training, known as Block IV-A training, to "embedded training teams" deploying to Afghanistan.

Several ETTs from III Marine Expeditionary Force, 3rd Marine Division, conducted part of that training here April 21-28.

The mission of the ETTs is to train, mentor, advise and provide coalition effects for the Afghanistan National Army in support of the government of Afghanistan.

The teams finished Block I through II – "shoot, move and communicate skills" - April 15. Now they are completing their Block IV-A advisor-specific training through the Mountain Viper training program, which has three venues, including the Combat Center.

The teams' nine days of training in the Mojave Desert were broken into five categories. During mounted operations training, the Marines were given the opportunity to use the Virtual Combat Convoy Trainer.

The VCCT is a trailer-sized trainer housing a full-sized non-operational humvee surrounded by projection screens.

HAWTHORNE ARMY AMMUNI-TION DEPOT, Nev. - When the long and winding road becomes the steep and impassable mountain ridge, vehicles topple, gear is grounded and operations come to a grinding halt. But if Marines have pack mules on their side, all but the steepest terrain can be overtaken. With the help of instructors from the Marine Corps Mountain Warfare Training Center in Bridgeport, Calif., Marines learn to pack their mules and traverse some of the most rugged terrain the Sierra Nevada Mountains have to offer.

"The saying goes, 'you can pack anything indigenous to an infantry battalion," said Anthony Parkhurst, a retired Marine master sergeant who has worked with the mules at Bridgeport and currently offers his skills and services with training evolutions. "A full compliment of mules can easily move an entire infantry battalion through the mountains."

Bridgeport's 27 mules are the only mules owned and operated by the Department of Defense, said Sgt. Arlen Gentert, stable noncommissioned-officer-in-charge and pack master. "A mule is a cross between a horse and a donkey, and they pick up the good traits from both. They have the problem-solving skills of a donkey with the strength and size from the horse. Other countries around the world use mules in their militaries, but we are the only ones in the DoD. Most people don't even know we exist."

Gentert and three other instructors from Bridgeport rode 22 mules more than 45 miles over rough mountains to the Army's Hawthorne Ammunition Depot, to assist with the "Mountain Viper" Afghanistan predeployment training program.

During normal training packages at Bridgeport, the team of instructors will train a few dozen Marines from a visiting battalion to pack, care for and use the mules. Here at Hawthorne, however, the training mission is different and the group is smaller, but they still receive exposure to being around and using mules in this terrain.

"Marines moving throughout Afghanistan will almost certainly encounter donkeys or some sort of domesticated pack animals," said Gentert. "We not only give them [Marines] the exposure, but the packing training as well in case their guide is wounded or something, they know what to do themselves and know what to look for if they have to buy something."

Parkhurst said the mule program began in 1983 as an experiment in response to the Afghan-Russian War, is they last a lot longer," said Gentert, and was designed to only last five years. Since then, they have become a regular part of instruction and are even used in local parades.

Drinking and driving can cost you

With Memorial Day approaching, service members can look forward to an upcoming 96 hour liberty. Some people may choose to stay at home and barbecue with family, while others may choose to go drink to have a good time.

With drinking comes a lot of responsiblity, such as obeying the legal drinking age of 21 and not letting anyone under age drink, as well as not drinking and driving. Drinking and driving can cost you a lot of money, wasted time, and possibly your career.

Did you know that the penalties for DUI or DWI in California (Maximum), are: 1st offence = 6 months in jail, up to $1,800 fine and license suspended for 120 days. 2nd offence = 1 year in jail, $1,000 fine and license suspended for one year. 3rd offence = 1 year in jail, $1,000 fine and license suspended for three years.

These are just the punishments and along with that you also have the cost of everything else.

 Vehicle towing $150 $50 per day Storage • Booking, fingerprinting, and photo fee $156 • Drivers license reinstatement fee $125 Car insurance increase

• (3-year mandatory insurance requirements) $1,000 per year $1,400 to $1,800 • 1st offense DUI fine Assessment for the court system $816 • Community service fee $150 DUI victims fund $100 Alcohol abuse education fund $50 • DUI classes $550 • DUI Victims' Impact sessions $20 Time payment charge $35

Minimum total fees, fines, and assessments $8,240*

• Public transportation for one year

* If you use an attorney, the initial consultation could range from $750 to $1,000

After these charges you will also be subject to punishment under the UCMJ, which may include loss of pay or pay grade. Be smart and don't drink and drive.

The team that runs the simulator screens. The team that runs the simulator can program different scenarios using the simulator's computers and screens.

"The program we run for the ETTs is based on scenarios they can expect to see," said Brian Robbins, an advanced training group instructor. "It gives them a better opportunity to train up on what they might encounter in country."

'We're here to use this million dollar facility to get better and work as a team Marines," said Maj. Joseph Cross, officerin-charge of ETT 4-2. "When we're doing this for real, we won't have time to make the mistakes we can work out using this training tool."

The Marines felt they benefited from the VCCT training.

"It's good for us Marines to be able to use something like this," Sgt. Lee Taylor said. "It allows us to make mistakes now and learn from them instead of making them in combat."

The next training the Marines received was resistance training, taught by Lt. Col. Chris Ross, a former Survival, Evasion, Resistance and Escape instructor and the advisor training group operations officer.

The gist of the class was simple: Marines do not want to get captured in combat.

Ross instructed the Marines on the six articles of conduct a Marine should follow if captured or taken hostage and ways to resist interrogation.

"It is really important for all Marines to receive resistance training," Ross said. "In today's battlefield, all Marines face a chance they might be forced to use this training, especially these ETTs. The number-one thing to remember is the importance of their resistance posture. Keep your emotions in check, keep good military bearing and self-discipline, and control what you can."

As the training week continued, the ETTs traveled to the range to get hands-on training with foreign weapons. The instructors gave a brief overview of each weapon and taught how to disassemble and assemble each one.

The ETTs were given the opportunity to live-fire both the AK-47 rifle and the PKM medium machine "Because these Marines are going over to train a foreign military, by knowing how to use these weapons proficiently, the foreigners will respect our guys more, and that in turn will gain more rapport and build relationships stronger," said Paul Brzostek, a foreign weapons instructor in the Advisor Training Group.

One of the most important training subjects was on the latest Counter Remote Control Improvised Explosive Device Electronic Warfare systems.

Each ETT will be using one of the CREW systems to prevent IED attacks on their convoys. The teams also walked through an IED lane intended to train the Marines on how to spot different types of IEDs.

"Basically, the IED threat is everywhere," said SSgt. Jules Thompson. "Being able to identify them and get the training needed to do so is extremely important. Recognition and vigilance are the two key factors in defeating the IED threat."

Throughout their training, the ETT Marines receive classes on operational cultural awareness. "The cultural part of their training is the heart and soul of what their mission is all about," said Dr. Thomas H. Johnson, a research professor of the Department of National Security Affairs at the Naval Postgraduate School in Monterey, Calif. "Through their training they are being taught the necessary skills to win the hearts and minds of the Afghan people so Afghanistan can become a sovereign country where the people believe in the government and the government believes in the people."

An Afghan scholar, Johnson's role in the training and was to educate the teams about the history and cultural nuances of the Afghan area of operations.

"The types of conflicts we're fighting right now are not the same our fathers and grandfathers fought," Johnson said. "We are fighting a counterinsurgency that is not won by just simply killing the bad guys. We need to turn our Marines into cultural and linguistic warriors that intimately know the environment and culture."

Afghan culture is vastly different from American culture and is full of deeply rooted traditions and honor codes. The ETTs will be expected to be able to form relationships with the Afghan people, civilian and military alike. Through the cultural training they are receiving, they hope to learn how to meet the expectations of the Afghan people and convince them to support the government, not the terrorists.

"The battlefield is the minds of the Afghan people," Johnson said. When the Marines finished their training at MCAGCC, they headed to the Marine Corps Mountain Warfare Training Center in Bridgeport, Calif., for their second training venue. Their third venue is Hawthorne Army Weapons Depot, Nev., then they graduate May 28 before beginning a staggered deployment.

According to Maj. David A. Williams of the Advisor Training Group, the Marines will deploy as the best trained and prepared training teams ever sent into theater.

Staff Sgt. Kevin Mahoney and Sgt. Jonathon Smith plot coordinates on a computer in order to direct fire to the gun line.

FDC keeps artillery firing

LANCE CPL. NICHOLAS M. DUNN

COMBAT CORRESPONDENT

Many people don't know that when an artillery battery goes to the field or is deployed to combat, there are more working parts to the battery than the howitzers and the gun crews.

The gun line is where most of the action takes place, but what happens behind the lines? Where do their orders come from? That's where the Fire Direction Center comes in.

The FDC is responsible for ensuring the gun line knows where to fire and if they hit their targets. They work with forward observers who determine target locations and relay them to the gun line.

"We receive the calls for fire, figure out the deflection and the quadrant of the guns, how much powder they need to use and what type of round to shoot," said Staff Sgt. Kevin Mahoney, the artillery operations chief for Battery I, 3rd Battalion, 11th Marine Regiment. "All of this is necessary for the guns to hit and destroy their targets."

The deflection and quadrant are the directions an artillery piece must move in order to adjust its aim. The deflection moves left to right and the quadrant moves up and down. The FDC also works directly with field radio operators, who provide the necessary communications that allow the FDC to talk to both the forward observers and the gun line.

receive the calls for fire from the forward observers," said Sgt. Jonathon Smith, a fire control man assigned to Battery I, 3/11. "Then they relay them to us so we can effectively do our jobs. We plot the coordinates on a chart and on a computer.

"Basically, we figure out the direction and distance the target is from our location, then relay those coordinates to the gun line," he added. "We can do it over the radio, but the new Digital Fire Control System allows us to relay all information to the gun line digitally. That makes our jobs easier and cuts the time it takes to relay everything in half."

The FDC's setup consists of a communications truck, an FDC truck and a tent that is set up between the two vehicles. Since artillery is a mobile ele-"The radio operators ment, the FDC has to be able to move as fast as the gun line.

> "We can move anywhere at any time," said Smith. "We have to be ready, and we have to move fast."

In the field, learning mobility is as much a part of the training as firing the howitzers. The Marines train how to move quickly and efficiently.

"The entire FDC can be set up or taken down within 10 minutes," added Cpl. Trevar Perkins, a fire control man assigned to Battery I, 3/11.

Although they are extremely efficient, the Marines on the gun line would become blind without the FDC. A forward observer does not have the capabilities the FDC has to effectively coordinate an artillery strike on a target. The FDC provides the essential element that has made Marine Corps artillery what it is today.

Another reason the mules are used for packing training is to educate Marines on the principles of packing, which some packers say is more art than science.

"The principles of packing remain pretty much the same for any animal once you learn, so if you can pack a mule, you can pack a donkey, a horse or an elephant," said Gentert. "It's a great baseline.

"I think the simple fact that we still train and use these animals is very unique," added Gentert. "It seems outdated, but sometimes it's the only means of ground transportation."

Rifle range Marines aim to serve marksmanship training

LANCE CPL. KATLEYN A. KNAUER

The rifle range is open, the targets are up, the coaches are ready to instruct and the shooters are ready to fire.

With the recent opening of the newly renovated rifle range, the Headquarters Battalion armory gears up to assist with the upcoming ranges and provide the weapons needed for smooth marksmanship training.

With a staff of five Marines the HQBN armory faces long and busy days to ensure that everything functions properly and Marines can be confident shooting on the range and handling their M-16 service rifles.

"We support the range details both with issuing rifles and ensuring if a rifle malfunctions during the detail that we get the problem fixed quick," said Lance Cpl. David M. Baldus, small arms weapon repair technician. "Marines that are on a detail at the range have to trust in their armorer that their weapon will function properly. We instill this confidence by making sure the rifles are cleaned and that a limited technical inspection and pre-fire inspections are performed on the rifles

The HQBN armory is in charge of storing, maintaining, issuing and recovering all weapons assigned to the armory.

"We have 139 M-16A2 service rifles, 268 M9 service pistols and 10 National Match rifles," said Baldus.

Along with the inventory of M-16 service rifles and M9 pistols the armory is also in charge of keeping account for nine MC-

58 rifles, eight M1911 H. B. pistols, eight Smith and Wesson M41 pistols, three M79 grenade launchers, three M2 .50 caliber machine guns, 34 AK-47 rifles, four designated marksman rifle's, 10 laser bore sights, 72 M49 spotting scopes, 50 bayonets, 16 K-bars and 30 security rounds.

While the range was closed, the Marines of the armory took the time to organize things at the armory with the little time they had.

"When the range was closed down we ensured all weapons were in good working order in preparation of the new range," said Baldus. "We made sure that everything was clean and that the armory was squared away."

Along with the hectic schedule of being in at 4:45 a.m. to open the armory and staying until six at night, the Marines who work in the armory are also tasked with other jobs such as coaching Marines on the use of the rifle or being the range safety officer during details.

"An average day for me consist of making sure that the daily records are updated, everything is accounted for, all the paper work is done and filled out properly, supervising and being a RSO for both the pistol and rifle range," said Staff Sgt. Roberto Lopez, armory staff noncommissioned officer in charge.

When it comes to working, the armory Marines are no strangers. They take their jobs seriously and know that what they do is important to the mission of the Marine Corps.

"Every Marine is a rifleman first," said Lopez. "That's what makes our job essential."

LANCE CPL. NICOLE A. LAVINE

COMBAT CORRESPONDENT

Due to the high importance of security aboard military installations, military police presence is crucial to maintaining good order. There can never be too many helping hands.

Cpl. Javier J. Zuniga, a machine gunner with Weapon's Company, 2nd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, recently finished serving his second term on the Fleet Assistance Program for the Provost Marshal's Office.

Zuniga said that in order to move into the PMO realm, a Marine cannot have any non-judicial punishments on his record, any convictions off base, serious traffic violations, and needs to be a fair and just executer of the law.

"The training lasts for two weeks, which is pre-service," said Zuniga. "Then you go through OJT either before or after pre-service."

Some of the PMO training consists of unarmed self defense, weapons handling and qualification, lessons on execution of deadly force, baton training, oleoresin capsicum spray training and class time. Marines also receive advanced training in close quarters battles, emergency driving and drug recognition.

"Once a Marine comes over, they will usually go to PMO operations or services," said Zuniga. "The majority will most likely go to PMO operations and work the road."

Zuniga added that despite the fact PMO FAP's are not always volunteers, Marines who come to the job with an open mind usually end up enjoying their time here because they are excited about the different job experiences and opportunities.

"Besides, most people who get out of the Marine Corps are trying to be police officers anyway, so it is a good way to get the experience under their belts," said Zuniga.

Lance Cpl. Anthony C. Jennings, who volunteered to serve with PMO, previously with Company L, 3rd Battalion, 4th Marine Regiment, said he was one of the Marines considering becoming a police officer once he left the Corps.

Jennings said even if a Marine is not considering a law enforcement career path, the training itself molds better and more proficient Marines.

"Being a Marine, you have a variety of different things you need to learn," he said. "It's good to take Marines out of their comfort zone every once in while because you need to deal with different things out in the world."

NASD fines Fidelity broker dealers $400k for misleading military personnel

NASD PRESS RELEASE

Washington, D.C. - National Association of Securities Dealers announced May 8 that it has fined two Fidelity brokerdealers $400,000 for preparing and distributing misleading sales literature promoting Fidelity's Destiny I and II Systematic Investment Plans, which were sold primarily to military personnel. Issuance and sales of new systematic investment plans (also known as periodic payment plans), which typically require investors to make a fixed number of monthly payments over a 10- to 15-year period, were prohibited by Congress last fall. Previously sold plans remain in force. As part of the settlement, for the next five years, the two broker-dealers - Fidelity investments Institutional Services Company, Inc., of Smithfield, R.I. and Fidelity Distributors Corporation of Boston - are required to notify Destiny Plan holders who want tions," said James S. Shorris, to increase their investments in existing Destiny Plans that additional shares of the underlying fund can be purchased outside the Destiny Plans without paying the additional creation and sales charges of up to 50 percent on the first year's payments.

"NASD's advertising rules are designed to protect investors by prohibiting misleading sales literature and other misleading communicaNASD Executive Vice President and Head of Enforcement. "In this case, the Fidelity Destiny Plans were sold using various performance charts and data that presented a misleading picture of the plans' performance. These failures were aggravated by the fact that the plans were sold primarily to military personnel, who often have limited time to study the marketing materials for investment products. And these particular products involve complex or unique features that may not be fully understood by the customers to whom they are offered or by the brokers who recommend them."

NASD found that between January 2003 and January 2006, the two broker-dealers violated NASD advertising rules by preparing and distributing various pieces of misleading sales literature. For instance, from May 2003 through January 2006, the Fidelity broker-dealers prepared and distributed a brochure entitled "Time is Money" that included misleading performance claims about the Destiny Plans. According to "mountain charts" contained in the brochures, Destiny Plans significantly outperformed the S&P 500 Index over a 30-year period. But during the most recent 10- and 15year periods-the time frame most relevant to current and prospective investors - Destiny Plans substantially underperformed the S&P 500 Index. The 30-year time period masked the underperformance of the Destiny Plans over the most recent 15 years.

The brochures also showed Destiny Plans' average annual total returns for 1,5 and 10 years as well as the life of the Plan, without showing comparable returns for the S&P 500 Index. Again, this created the misleading impression that Destiny outperformed the S&P 500 Index throughout the periods shown.

The comparable S&P 500 Index average annual total returns would have shown that the S&P 500 Index significantly outperformed Destiny during the more current time periods. Finally, the broker-dealers used the performance of Destiny Plan Class O shares in these charts, when new Plan investors could only purchase Class N shares. Class N shares did not perform as well as Class O shares because of higher ongoing expenses. The broker-dealers prepared and sent over 10,000 copies of these brochures to Destiny retail brokers or their registered representatives to use them with both prospective investors as well as current Plan holders.

NASD also found that in May 2003, the Fidelity brokerdealers prepared and distributed a misleading Destiny newsletter to over 325,000 Destiny Plan holders. The newsletter included a mountain chart showing Destiny I Plan performance. While the chart showed Plan performance, Fidelity disclosed the average annual total returns for the underlying mutual fund portfolio, rather than for the Plan. Because Plan holders paid a 50 percent upfront sales charge on each of the first year's payments and a continuing sales charge on each additional payment until plan payments were completed, the average annual total returns for the Plans were significantly lower than that of the underlying funds.

NASD further found that Fidelity did not adequately supervise the review of this Destiny sales literature in light of the unusual features of the Destiny products.

The $400,000 fine will be paid to the NASD Investor Education Foundation (a taxexempt, non-profit organization) to help fund its Military Financial Education Campaign, launched in February 2006. NASD Investor Education Foundation will use the funds to support educational programs, materials and research to equip members of the United States military and their families with the knowledge and skills necessary to make informed financial decisions. More information about the ongoing, global campaign can be found at http:// www.saveandinvest.org

Fidelity Investments Institutional Services Company and Fidelity Distributors Corporation settled the action without admitting or denying the charges, but consented to the entry of NASD's findings.

Investors can obtain more information about, and the disciplinary record of, any NASD-registered broker or brokerage firm by using NASD's BrokerCheck.

NASD makes BrokerCheck available at no charge.
