Combat Center Marines train to counter IED threats at Range 800

LANCE CPL. M. C. NERL
COMBAT CORRESPONDENT

Improvised explosive devices account for 85 percent of American and North Atlantic Treaty Organization forces casualties during Operation Enduring Freedom. So, stopping this deadly threat has been a top priority for military officials.

After approximately 18 months of planning and construction, the Combat Center opened Range 800 April 9 to train tenant units on the basics of counter-IED warfare.

Mike Fay is the site lead instructor for the new, $16 million range, which was established solely for tenant units to receive blocks one through five of the training. Many other suitable areas aboard the Combat Center are constantly in use by visiting units conducting pre-deployment training with Enhanced Mojave Viper.

"The home station training is already conducted at other bases, to include [Marine Corps Bases] Camp Pendleton and Camp Lejeune," said Fay, from San Francisco. "The IED is the most effective weapon for insurgents, because they don't want to go toe-to-toe with the Marine Corps in battle."

Fay said a combination of data collected from overseas and incorporation of the data into the training they give Marines has led to an increased success rate in combating IEDs.

"We've noticed improvement in the units that have had the training when they're deployed," he said. "The Master Lesson Files we teach are a precursor to Mojave Viper and what they'll learn there. We teach them the fundamentals of counter IED warfare."

Fay described what the service members here can expect from the range.

"The first lane also includes possible IED and security checks, reaction to detonated IEDs in conjunction with the five C's [Confirm, clear, cordon, control and call] and fives and 25s [five and 25 meter checks around the vehicle]," he said. "In the optics lane, Marines learn how to use their optics on their rifle or binoculars to scan for IEDs. In the indicator lane they learn about the visual indicators of an IED."

The length of the course changes from unit-to-unit depending on specific requests from each command.

Scott Wheeler, a C-IED instructor here, said it is almost like an arms race between Marines and a resourceful enemy.

"We change the classes if need be, based on our research on the trends in country," said the Mendota, Ill., native. "The enemy is always watching us and always recording us. They study the patterns we use, and try to one-up us constantly.

"They get to pick and choose where they put the IEDs," Wheeler said. "To help the Marines get better, we try to teach them to think like an insurgent when dealing with IEDs, based on the trends we've seen in Afghanistan."

Loren Hutton, another instructor, gave further insight into just how experienced the enemy is, based on their nation's history of conflict.

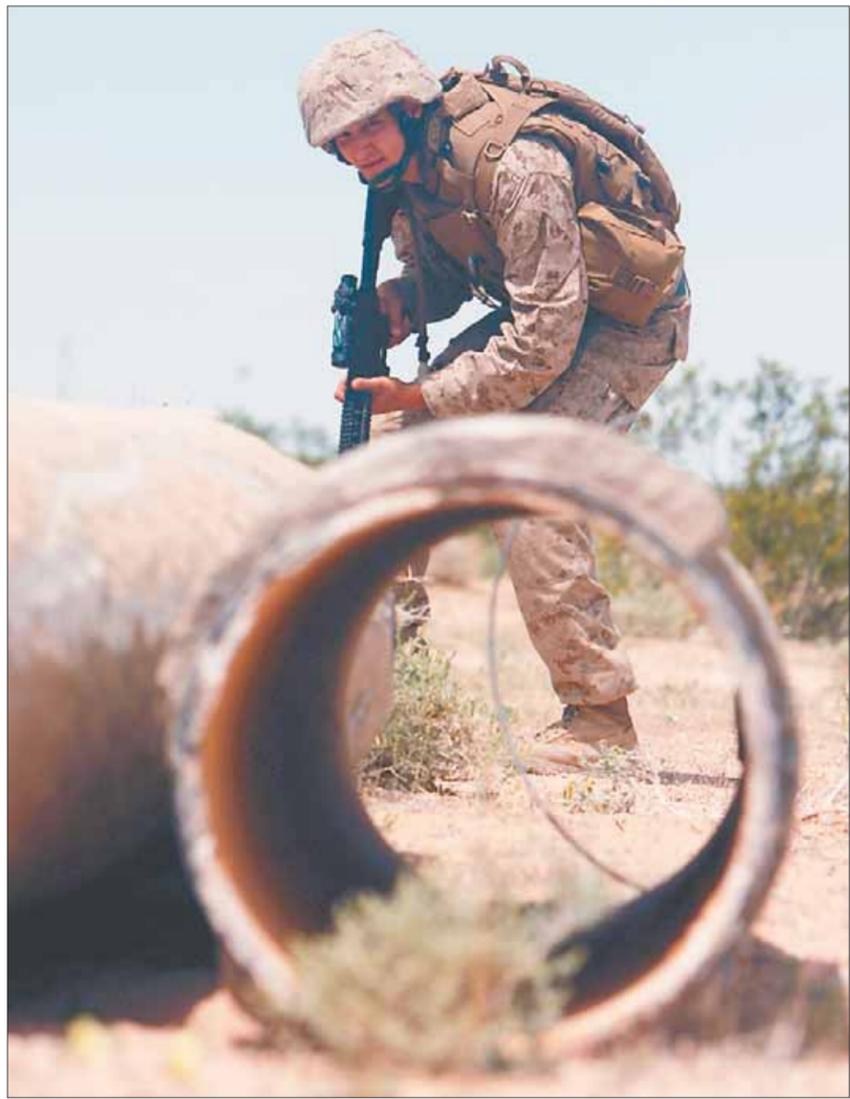

"Afghanistan has been fighting conventional militaries for 60 years," said the Apple Valley, Calif., native. "They know what attack sites worked well against the British and Soviets. The enemy likes to use them again and again, because they know how well they worked."

They pass these attack sites down from generation to generation," he said to an attentive class of Marines. "It just shows how much it means that you do your research."

Marines who have completed the training said learning and practicing these techniques as early as possible before deployment is essential so that implementing them becomes second nature.

"We have a lot of new

Get hip to HIPAA

TYLER PATTERSON
TriWest Healthcare Alliance

Whether you access your health care through TRICARE or a private health insurance plan, you've probably had to sign a HIPAA form every time you filled out paperwork at your doctor's office. Do you know why? What exactly is HIPAA, and what does it mean for you?

HIPAA, or the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996. HIPAA works for you by advocating four important things:

Insurance Portability

Simply put, HIPAA's portability requirement means you can retain access to your health insurance while changing employers or leaving the workforce. This helps avoid lapses in coverage that could cost you benefits down the road.

Lower Insurance Costs

According to a study by the Department of Medicine at Cambridge Hospital and Harvard Medical School, 31 percent of every healthcare dollar spent in the U.S. is spent on administrative costs. HIPAA aims to reduce those costs through "administration simplification." Administration simplification establishes national standards for electronic transmission of certain health information. If fully implemented, this would help control administrative costs while improving the quality and efficiency of your health care.

Patient Privacy

HIPAA also establishes very strict rules and regulations protecting your privacy as a patient. It regulates how and to whom your information can be disclosed to make sure your protected health information stays private. You will get a copy of your HIPAA privacy rights from your doctor as part of your routine paperwork.

Patient Rights

Among other things, HIPAA gives patients rights regarding their health information. Thanks to HIPAA, you have the right to access, review and copy your protected health information, request changes to it, limit who can see it or what parts they can see, and more.

Want to know more about HIPAA, including how TriWest, the West Region TRICARE program administrator, protects your personal information? Visit www.triwest.com and click "Privacy Policy" at the bottom of the page.

Question: What can we do at home to create good homework habits?
Answer: Homework is definitely a major part of your child's education. Here are some ways you can help your child build good homework habits. It's better to develop strategies for dealing effectively with homework rather than fight the homework battle every single day!

- Pay attention to assignments. Kids can easily get away with not completing homework if parents don't know what the assignments are or when they are due.
- Be interested and involved in your child's school work. If you show interest in the subject your child is studying, then homework becomes a time for you and your child to connect instead of a horrible task to get through.
- Set the stage for homework. If necessary, let them rest a bit after schools so they're not too tired. Talk to them about their day and make sure the emotional needs are met. Are they hungry? Have a quick snack. Do they have the paper, pencils, colors and all supplies they need for the project? Don't give them any excuses to not do the work.
- Make it a habit. Establish routines around homework. Create a homework place in the home. Expect them to do their homework at the same time/place everyday.
- Set a good example. Children learn by watching adults around them. If you have a daily activity that you put off until the last minute, the child is learning a good excuse to do the same with their homework.
- Be available to help. Homework can be hard and will get harder as they advance in school. Homework is designed to build on the lessons learned at school. Be ready to help with questions, but not ready to do the work for them. Hold them accountable!

Alcohol awareness key to mission readiness

CPL. ANDREW S. AVITT
COMBAT CORRESPONDENT

Many people don't know five servings of alcohol in one sitting qualifies as binge drinking or a driving under the influence violation in the state of California can cost up to $13,000.

Unfortunately for many drivers, they learn the sobering facts after the hangover and while facing DUI and other serious criminal charges.

"I'm not saying you can't or shouldn't drink, I'm just saying be responsible," said Billy V. Smith, an alcohol abuse prevention specialist with the Combat Center's Substance Abuse Counseling Center.

Educating oneself is an important part of being responsible, he said while also explaining April is Alcohol Awareness Month.

Although the Marine Corps was born in a bar and drinking seems to be ingrained in generations of Marines, the importance of being aware of the effects and consequences pertaining to alcohol is vital, said Smith, from Wichita Falls, Texas.

"The party animal aspect of Marine life is changing," Smith said. "The Marine Corps is pushing the healthier Marine concept. The bottom line with alcohol is that it affects mission readiness."

The SACC has many programs designed to keep alcohol in the forefront of Marine Corps leaders' minds. The basic safety brief given before every liberty period, annual alcohol training for noncommissioned officers and annual commanders' summit all aim to keep alcohol abuse a talked-about issue rather than a private problem.

Smith, a recovering alcoholic of 27 years, has been there before.

As a corporal, Smith began receiving treatment for alcoholism after an altercation with another Marine in his unit. He received treatment several times before kicking the habit for good.

"I was one of those hard-headed Marines. Don't tell me I can't do something," he said, reflecting on his younger days in the Marine Corps. "If I can get just one Marine today to stop and think about it, I've done my job."

Smith regularly teaches an alcohol impact class for servicemembers involved in DUIs or other alcohol-related incidents. Part of what he tries to do is impress upon servicemembers how alcohol affects their perception, goals, and to dispel alcohol myths.

The fastest way to sober up is not by exercising, or drinking coffee or water, but many still put their faith in this dangerous college lore, said Smith.

What offenders should believe, said Smith is that DUIs and other alcohol-related incidents can haunt violators at critical points in their lives like when applying to colleges or jobs.

However, Smith said he can't get the word out by himself, commands play a big part in keeping their Marines informed.

Steve Mann, the director of SACC, agrees with Smith.

"Prevention starts at the top," said Mann. "If you get a command that's loosey-goosey about booze, it shouldn't be a surprise when alcohol-related incidents start happening."

Although it's tough for commanders to focus on this issue because their mission is to fight and destroy things, we believe that alcohol prevention can help them in the end by positively effecting mission readiness," said Mann.

Marines facilitate crop change through agriculture transition program

Participants in the Marjah Accelerated Agricultural Transition program register their crops and where they live at the government center in Marjah, Afghanistan, April 13. FORWARD OPERATING BASE MARJAH, HELMAND PROVINCE, Afghanistan – A little more than a week since it first began, the Marjah Accelerated Agricultural Transition program has begun to gain momentum in Marjah, Afghanistan, April 14. The program is one of several others, including programs provided by non-governmental organizations, which the Afghan government and coalition forces are conducting in order to foster agricultural growth.

The programs are designed to assist farmers and landowners in their transition to alternate and licit crops. In many, but not all cases, this involves the switch from opium, the illicit product of poppy cultivation, to other crops that will allow participants to make a living, legally.

Designed as a short term solution meant to give the city's citizens a leg to stand on, MAAT is aimed specifically at residents of Marjah and only for the current harvest season, in order to stabilize the city's market and provide residents with a viable and legal source of income.

"We are trying to ease the transition from illicit crops to licit in order to prepare for next year," explained Maj. David Fennell the Civil Affairs team leader attached to 1st Battalion, 6th Marine Regiment. "We want the Afghan people to understand we're trying to help them transition even though we're interfering with [the opium] market."

The registration for the program is a multistep process where those wishing to participate first sign up with the NGO's, from whom they will receive seeds and fertilizer. Next, they can choose to participate in the Marjah Accelerated Agricultural Transition program. If they decide to take part in MAAT, they will register where they live, the amount of land they farm on, and what crop they grow.

Participants will be issued ID cards as well as vouchers, which will be used later on when they run across Marine patrols, who will look in on those who have signed up for SAN ONOFRE, Calif.—All was quiet on the shores of San Onofre, Calif., the night of April 14, except for the sound of waves crashing on the shore as the tide rolled in and out.

The scene was still - almost surreal - until two Marines rose from the water slowly and aimed their rifles toward the sandy beach ahead. Their objective - find a safe landing zone for an amphibious raid force tasked with taking out a simulated lightly-defended enemy force three kilometers inland.

For the Marines of Company B, 1st Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment, this kind of training was far from what they're use to. There were no doors to be kicked in or rooms to be button-hooked, no calls for fire support or vehicles to be dismounted. Just a quiet beach and a group of heavily-armed, pumped-up Marines waiting patiently at sea for the signal to raid.

Co. B trained in numerous maritime tactics during the last two-and-a-half months in preparation for the battalions' deployment with the 31st Marine Expeditionary Unit. This is the first time the unit will deploy with a MEU in more than a decade. The final step in the battalion's transition back to amphibious operations will be a large scale exercise designed to fit all the working pieces of what they learned together.

"This is a great opportunity for our guys to learn what it takes to operate on ship, and get to see another side of the Marine Corps," said 1st Lt. Derek Rey, the assistant operations officer for the battalion.

Some of the classes taught to the Marines of Co. B included maritime navigation, coxswain skills, scout swimming, combat rubber reconnaissance crafts and maritime leading course, all of which are essential for the missions they will conduct as the 31st MEU's battalion landing team. The unit will provide the unique capability to insert a sizeable clandestine force into enemy-infested areas.

The exercise started an hour after dusk, using the low visibility of night as cover to start the reconnaissance of the beach landing zone.

A Landing Craft, Air Cushion dropped 17 F470 Combat Rubber Raiding Crafts 15 nautical miles from shore to begin the raid.

"We were on the water for a while," said Lance Cpl. Jacob King, a wave leader with Co. B. "The cold was a different type of cold - the wind just blows away your body heat."

The crafts navigated approximately 500 meters from the shore. Eight scout swimmers took to the water and finned to the landing zone to gather information about the beach. They assessed potential obstacles, the best landing area for the raid force and enemy presence in the area.

After determining the area was safe, the scout swimmers signaled to the rest of their platoon to come ashore.

"Communication is very important," Rey said. "Radio might not always work, infrared signals might not always work, but as long as the two types of communications overlap, the message will get there."

On cue, waves of Marines from Co. B poured onto the ashore. They moved to quickly secure their water crafts from the surging tide and quietly pulled their boats out of the surf.

"Once we hit land, we trained so much that everyone knew what they had to do, so there wasn't need for much talking," King said. "But that's not to say things went smoothly."

As the Marines came ashore, their boats and gear gained additional weight from the brisk water crashing over them.

"The boats were so heavy 12 Marines couldn't lift them, let alone 6, which made us realize the need to carry something in the boats to bail out the water once ashore," said Capt. Roberto Rodriguez, the commanding officer for Co. B.

"Its good to train in horrible conditions, though, because that's the way it could really be, and they can only get better because of it," he said.

Marines in the company, and in the squadron, basically," said Capt. Roy Miner, Marine Wing Support Squadron 374's Motor Transportation Company commander. "Training them specifically to operate in an IED environment is essential to a proactive warfighting posture."

Miner's Marines are deploying to Afghanistan the fall of next year and have completed the beginning phase of their training.

Miner said this training will benefit them down the road as the squadron heads into a hostile place.

"We're preparing our Marines, because there is always that possibility they will encounter IEDs when in a convoy," said the Pittsburgh, Calif., native. "I'm hoping they will become familiar with these tactics being used by the insurgents in the Afghanistan theater."

Miner said his Marines have overcome the initial difficulties of their inexperience and have started to improve their tactics, work as a team and adapting to their mission.

"The different parts of the company began working together, and we're building a more cohesive company in an IED environment," he said.

Miner said the obstacles his Marines will face overseas are mirrored very well by the new range's training.

"We get a chance to refine and improve on our IED [tactics, techniques and procedures] in a realistic situation," he said. "The training and feedback we're getting here helps us greatly improve on our TTPs before we actually get over there."

For more information on scheduling training, call 760-819-3413 or 760-310-4164.

First Afghan National Army recruiting event draws dozens in Nawa

SGT. BRIAN A. TUTHILL

REGIMENTAL COMBAT TEAM 7

PATROL BASE JAKER, NAWA, Afghanistan – More than 60 citizens from Nawa District gathered at Patrol Base Jaker, near the district center area, for Nawa's first-ever Afghan National Army recruiting and information event April 12.

Attendees and ANA soldiers displaying automatic weapon systems mounted atop their trucks, watched a squad of soldiers conduct a close order drill demonstration, passed in review of Afghan and Marine officers and marched around a group of citizens.

"Look at these soldiers, they are not from here," Col. Ali Ahmad, an ANA cultural and religious advisor, said to the crowd, pointing out physical differences in the soldiers who hail from various parts of the country. "If you join the army, you will travel and serve the entire country, not just the town you're from or the tribe you belong to – but all of Afghanistan."

Men young and old nodded their heads in agreement as Ahmad described the benefits the army offers each individual and how military service is important to the future of an independent and free Afghanistan.

"One message Col. Ahmad delivered in particular was to dispel myths and counter Taliban propaganda about religion," said Maj. Ramon Garcia, the Marine officer-in-charge of Embedded Partnering Team 1-1-215, which helps train the ANA battalion based in Nawa. "The Taliban said the ANA is very secular, that it's against the five pillars of Islam, and soldiers are not allowed to pray. He explained how they pray five times a day, and the ANA encourages their soldiers to practice the tenets of Islam. I think it dispelled a lot of the propaganda, especially since he's a religious leader within the battalion."

Many of the attendees to the event were local farmers or laborers, but most of whom were outside the qualifying ages of 18-32 for military service. Despite that fact, Garcia said having so many elder males attend the event to hear about serving their country was beneficial since those men have influence in the local communities.

"I was pleasantly surprised at how articulate Col. Ahmad was in talking to the people about the ANA and its significance to the future of Afghanistan," Garcia said. "He didn't conceal anything. He was very upfront and forthright with them in everything he talked about. That's especially important because most of the front row was elders, who will help spread the word, and the spoken word is very powerful here."

Even though 15-year-old farmhand Mohammed Shah attended the event at the encouragement of a local elder man, he said he was not particularly interested in joining the army, but would share the information he learned at the event with friends.

"Today I learned about the army and how soldiers work and help the country," Shah said. "I don't think I will join, but I'll tell others what they said here today. We need a good army."

For those men who were of age at the event, most said service in the army was not necessarily appealing because they had successful farms, businesses or families to care for in Nawa.

Although nobody came forward to sign up for service that day, Garcia still considered the event a success and hopes to make future recruiting events larger, more frequent, and better advertised to have more military-aged males in attendance.

TOUGH MINDED OPTIMISM

by Lou Gerhardt

Remember the haunting voice –over in the motion picture "Field of Dreams" that strongly encouraged a mid-western farmer to act on his dream of building a baseball field on his farm? The voice whispered "Build it and they will come." And, of course, his dream became a reality.

Well, I've met a real life dreamer who is following his dream. His name is Moe Pegorelli of Twentynine Palms. He has taken a spacious empty furniture store building on Adobe road and is rapidly turning it into a popular gathering place for people of all ages.

When the building is completely remodeled there will be a pool room, a short order restaurant with a wide variety of sandwiches, soft drinks, beer and wine, a first class Italian restaurant operated by an experienced restaurateur, and well equipped Dutch bakery operated by a baker with decades of experience as the proprietor of a similar bakery in the low desert. The fabulous dream is rapidly becoming a reality. Moe, his lovely wife Sloane, and their children have constructed a home in Twentynine Palms and are already fully involved in the community. What a tremendous addition they are to the High Desert.

Moe's business is named HEADQUARTERS and it already opens every day and has enjoyed incredible acceptance by the entire city in a matter of a few weeks. Why not stop in and check it out. Maybe even have a sandwich and/or the drink of your choice.

Incidentally, Moe, a true tough minded optimist with the courage to act on his dream may be reached by telephoning 1-760-367-2100.

CROP, from A3

the program, in order to gauge whether or not they have made the change to their target crop.

If MAAT-registered land owners make the change to licit crops, they will then receive payment, 3,000 Afghans and new tools, including wheelbarrows, shovels, and a new water pump.

To date approximately 1,000 people have registered for the program, Fennell explained, adding that although the turnout wasn't as large as was first anticipated, it is seen as a good sign in light of reports from locals stating that residents have received threats from the Taliban. Many of which came in the form of night letters, which are written warnings delivered in the evening, forbidding locals from interacting with coalition forces.

"We're here to make a good will gesture," Fennell said. "The thing I personally like about [MAAT] is that the Taliban don't like it. Once we started this, reports of night letters and death threats arose, and engagements with the Taliban in the area increased. Once that happened, it was a sign that this was working."

"The Taliban haven't had the effect that they wanted," Fennell said when he referenced a protest that broke out in front of the government center a few days prior. "The protest wasn't the end goal for the Taliban, it was meant to be a catalyst designed to create a riotous event, but the Marines, through strength and discipline kept it from happening by defusing the situation. At that moment, they fought the Taliban and won."

Projects of this nature affect the insurgency on two fronts. The first is by challenging one of the core aims of the Taliban, which is the interaction of coalition forces with locals.

"Any contact you have with a local national is a good thing," Fennell said. "The goal of the Taliban is to keep us from engaging with the government or populace in any way. This program creates another opportunity for us to interact with them and vice versa."

The second front is more direct. By assisting farmers and land owners in changing their crops, it allows many of them to switch from growing opium, which is one of the Taliban's primary sources of income, explained 1st Lt. Michael Thatcher, the platoon commander for 81 mm Mortar Platoon, Weapon's Company, 1/6.

"This provides the opportunity and incentive [for farmers] to move away from illicit crops and denies the Taliban money to fight as well as benefiting the local populace," Thatcher said.

assistance to Marines and sailors and their families through grants and loans. Caseworkers also educate service members about budgeting, which helps them from falling into debt in the future.

Organizers usually begin planning for this event six months in advance to make sure everyone who has volunteered hours in that time-frame is acknowledged, said De-Ann Lotspeich, a volunteer for NMCRS from Alturas, Calif., who gave 1,000 hours of her time. "Eighty percent of the people volunteer, so the organization really runs on volunteers. They're not only important, they're essential for the team to work."

Sitting amongst the volunteer caseworkers were groups of ladies who make afghans, blankets and quilts for programs like Budget for Baby. The quilters added a little extra fun into their groups with unofficial names like the "Happy Hookers," "Mormon Mafia" and the "Cactus Syllables."

Sgt. Maj. John J. Elliott, 3rd Light Armored Reconnaissance Battalion's sergeant major, from Grandin, N.D., was the guest speaker. He told them how much he appreciates their hard work and dedication. Elliott presented a Wolf Pack coin to Ruth Hanft, who has volunteered with various organizations since 1944.

"This is our battalion coin, and on the back it reads, the strength of the pack is the wolf, and the strength of the wolf is the pack. You embody all of that, everything you do is strengthening us," Elliott said as he shook Hanft's hand.

The 94-year-old Columbus Junction, Iowa, native, began volunteering in North Carolina for the United Services Organizations, then for the American Red Cross. When she moved to Japan with her husband, she volunteered as a Gray Lady to raise the morale of sick and wounded service members. She began volunteering with NMCRS more than 30 years ago.

Fellow volunteers looked on as the ladies were presented with their awards, which ranged from pins, watches and plaques, depending on how many hours they volunteered for the society. One active duty Marine, Master Gunnery Sgt. William Cutrer, was given a pin for 100 hours of service.

His wife, Michele Cutrer, the chair of volunteers for the Combat Center's NMCRS, said it is rare for active duty Marines to give so many hours due to their busy schedules.

"He is the only active duty volunteer to be getting his 100 hour pin [for the Combat Center]," said Michele, a Houston, native.

Elliott praised volunteers for being a calming element in the chaos of the storm.

"When [Marines and sailors] come in, once they talk to you, it is a little more relaxing," Elliott said. "There is somebody out there who can help them and get them in the right direction," Elliott said. "You go out there, volunteering your time and effort to help these young men and women get through their crisis."

Fitness Festival makes family health fun

CPL. MONICA C. ERICKSON

Splash! Children squealed with delight as a well-aimed ball hit its target and a life-guard plummeted into a dunk tank. Music from a local radio station punctuated the joyous din of children's laughter as they enjoyed carnival-style games. This was the scene during the Family Fun Fitness Festival at the Commissary and Home Store parking lots April 17 and 18.

The festival offered more than just games, it was also a source of information for Combat Center parents to learn about local emergency and recreational services, safety and family fitness.

Although this is the first year for this festival, it is not the only one of its kind. More than a hundred Department of Defense installations across the world are also gearing up for their Family Fun Fitness Festivals, according to a Defense Commissary Agency press release.

Despite the blaring sun and heat, many families attended the two-day health hoopla to see what the installation is doing to enhance their physical and mental fitness and well-being.

"We have so many groups teaming up together to ensure this event provides as much information as possible," said Niki McBain, the Combat Center's Marine Corps Community Services coordinator, from Jensen

MCCS Semper Fit, the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department, the American Red Cross, Combat Center Aquatics, the

A plethora of activities and competitions geared toward all ages kept the party rolling. One of the more popular activities was in the paintball tent. Children watched in awe as combat-hardened Marines peppered targets with splatters of paint. A few brave children even stepped forward to receive a few tips on how to fire a paintball gun accurately and safely.

Golf tournament an ace for fundraiser

SGT. HEATHER GOLDEN

EDITOR/PRESS CHIEF

Almost 100 golfers mixed business with pleasure as they drove, sliced, stroked and putted to the hole to help provide higher education opportunities to Morongo Basin students during the Copper Mountain College Foundation's 26th annual golf tournament at the Combat Center's Desert

Winds Golf Course Saturday.

In just a day of play, the tournament raised $7,000 for educational programs and equipment. The college, whose main campus is located in Joshua Tree, Calif., also hosts classes at the Combat Center for service members and their families.

An entry fee of $70 per player covered 18 holes of best-ball play with a team of four, range balls, breakfast, lunch and dinner, said Tim Connolly, the assistant manager of the golf course.

After 26 years of organizing the same event, one would think the planning process to be relatively simple. Not so, said Mario Villescas, the tournament's chairman and a CMC Foundation board member.

"It takes hard work and imagination," said Villescas, from Pecos, Texas. "The first [planning] meeting was in November, and we met twice a month until last month, and then we were meeting every week. It took hundreds of man-hours."

The committee ran into another issue which set this year apart from previous ones.

"With the economy the way it is, unless you talk [with potential sponsors] face-to-face, a letter requesting support is not going to do it," he said, explaining the donation process which funds the yearly competition.

Villescas said this worked in their favor, though, and opened up new opportunities to get out into the community and meet people.

The team raised funds and made friends, he added.

A chance meeting with actor Raymond Cruz, whose resume includes playing Det. Julio Sanchez on "The Closer" and Domingo Chavez in "Clear and Present Danger," during a New Year's party earlier this year gave Villescas one more unique element to help make this year's event a success.

Signups for intramural soccer end May 5

Aspiring soccer players have until May 5 to sign up for the Commanding General's Intramural Soccer League, which begins at Felix Field May 10.

Although four unit teams have already been formed, Skip Best, the sports director, is hoping to have six to eight teams before the deadline.

Team rosters normally consist of players from within the same unit. However, if a unit has not formed a team or there are no open spots on their unit's team, potential players are eligible to play with a different team by signing a waiver, Best said.

"If I come across someone who really wants to play, but they missed deadlines, I will still let them play on a team as long as they are eligible," said Best, a Honolulu native.

The season lasts until mid-July, and the teams will play once or twice a week at Felix Field, depending on how many teams sign up for the league.

Some teams have already begun practicing. Nathan Rohn, a defenseman with the newly formed MCCES team, said the early start will really help his team stabilize as a group.

"We have a lot of [Marine Corps Communications-Electronics School] students who play for our team," said Rohn, a Fountain Hills, Ariz., native. "They're really energetic, but they don't have a lot of experience."

Rohn, who has been playing soccer since he was a toddler, said he acted more as a coach to his teammates than just a fellow teammate during practice.

"I really urged the players to communicate, but it is something we still have to work on," he explained. His players make up for the lack of experience with drive, determination and endurance. "They never gave up out there, so I definitely see the potential for a good team."

To raise the level of his 20-member squad, Rohn began practicing with the Base Soccer Team. The team

'Clash of the Titans' an exhausting spectacle

NEIL POND
AMERICAN PROFILE

We owe a significant cultural debt to the Greeks. Fine arts, sports, medicine, philosophy, the letters on the front of frat houses – thank you, achievers of Mediterranean antiquity, for these and many other fine things.

But you can't hold the Greeks responsible for "Clash of the Titans," even though it's their story. No, for this one, you can thank – and blame – Hollywood. And France. Paris-born Louis Letterier, who brought "The Incredible Hulk" to the big screen in 2008, directed this romping, stomping revisit to the legend of Perseus, the mythological Greek demi-god, king and monster slayer.

Sam Worthington from "Avatar" plays Perseus, the mixed-breed son of the deity Zeus and a mortal mother who grows up unaware he's got god-juice in his veins. But when humans pick a fight with their cosmic CEOs up on Mount Olympus, and Perseus' adopted family dies as a result, he springs into action as a resistance fighter. It's only then he learns his true nature, the unique position, the power it affords him and the crucial role he's destined to play in the epic struggle.

Now, wait a minute, you say. Wasn't this already a movie? Yes, indeed, it was, back in 1981, when Harry Hamlin put on a toga for the lead role. This new "Clash" throws one wink-wink at its cinematic predecessor, in a scene when Perseus briefly comes across an object – a golden owl – that featured prominently in the first movie.

As you might imagine, filmmaking technology has changed a bit over the years. Though the two "Clash of the Titans" movies share basic framework and characters, this one wallows in computer-generated, special-effect riches that were only a dream back in 1981. Worthington's Perseus battles gigantic scorpions, stalks the deadly, snake-haired, serpent-bodied Medusa and faces off with an enormous, hulking beast called the Kraken that rises out of the ocean.

It's a spectacle, but not necessarily one that dazzles. The action sequences are chaotic, the plot is difficult to follow, and the cheesy sets sometimes look like props from a theme-park ride (and it looks even worse in 3-D, so if you go, save your money and see it on a "standard" screen.) A meant-to-be chilling encounter with three blind witches comes off almost as a comedy sketch. As Zeus and Hades, respectively, esteemed actors Liam Neeson and Ralph Fiennes bring a degree of theatrical gravity to their roles, but are mostly swallowed up by the noisy, overly busy special effects constantly swirling, splashing and slamming around them.

It's hard to miss the pop-cultural cornerstones on which this project was built, from "King Kong" to "Lord of the Rings," not to mention the sword-and-sandal format itself, established in the 1950s by a wave of Hercules muscle movies and the stop-motion animation of Ray Harryhausen. That's one of the problems: We've seen so much of this before. And even rip-roaring special effects can't carry a movie alone.

Character development clearly isn't a priority here. Nobody's given much to do that doesn't involve heaving, cleaving, swatting or slashing. But, in a way, "Clash of the Titans" does make you feel for its hero. By the time Perseus sends Hades packing back to the underworld, beheads Medusa, topples the gigantic Kraken and dives to the bottom of the sea to rescue the princess, you'll feel exhausted.

Cruz and the tournament boasted a celebrity team consisting of Cruz, fellow "The Closer" actors Phillip Keene and Michael Paul Chan, and Geoffrey Rivas, who plays a detective on the CSI series.

"It sounded like a great idea," Cruz said. "We feel honored to be asked to play here."

"Any little thing to further education, and I'm all for it," Chan added.

The committee cannot take all the recognition for another successful year, though, said Villescas. He also credited the golf course staff for their efforts, saying the foundation may have organized sponsorship and the details of making the event happen, but the golf course staff is the real reason the tournament itself was such a success.

The tournament is just one of three annual fundraisers which supply the majority of the year's funds. Other events include an art auction and fall dinner.

The foundation provides funding for "college programs and student support, such as scholarships, student events, art lectures, an annual book for student writers and art programs," said Syndee Slayton, the Foundation's executive director.

The foundation also bought audiovisual equipment and built a multi-function facility, the Bell Center, which includes a multi-use gymnasium and sporting fields.
